Charlotte's broadband deserts reflect a familiar pattern

[DIGITAL CHARLOTTE]

If you live or work in Charlotte, there's a distinct possibility your broadband access is less than satisfactory. But you have options. A familiar wedge-and-crescent pattern of economic inequality also applies to broadband internet connections, slowing down access to development and educational opportunities in wide swaths of the city.

NC CIO: Charlotte leads in digital inclusion [DIGITAL CHARLOTTE]

Charlotte leads the state in digital inclusion programs. How can it help other communities? A discussion with Eric Boyette, secretary of the State of North Carolina's Department of Information Technology, reveals that Charlotte is a leading force for digital inclusion in the state. Boyette says the city's work serves as an example for other communities.

community [DIGITAL CHARLOTTE]

Students from Queens' James L. Knight School of Communication are collaborating for the first time with Google Fiber on a service initiative designed to strengthen digital inclusion in Charlotte. Called the Community Leaders Program, it marks the first time the company has integrated the national initiative with a university course.

Bonus Story

Need to teach digital skills? Digital Charlotte can help. [DIGITAL CHARLOTTE]

Many non-profit organizations support people who need to learn new online skills, but lack the classroom technology to help them. Digital Charlotte is making a new portable technology laboratory available for these groups. After a non-profit organization partners with Digital Charlotte and completes training and certification, it can then check out and transport the lab to events in the community.
